As we've mentioned before, shot variety makes for a more interesting story. In most cases, if your entire video consists of one single shot, your audience won't stay engaged.

The inspiration for this Challenge comes from Weekend Challenge participant Pat Boberg, and this video by directors Glen Milner and Ben Hilton:

Online web video editor

<https://popcorn.webmaker.org>

The screenshot shows the Mozilla Popcorn.js online video editor interface. At the top, there's a navigation bar with 'Media' (selected), 'Events', and 'Project'. Below it is a 'Create new media clip' section with a text input field and icons for YouTube, Clyp, SoundCloud, Vimeo, and HTML5. There are also buttons for 'Create' and 'Cancel'. Below this is another input field for media links. A 'My Media' section follows, containing a list of media items with preview thumbnails and delete icons. At the bottom is the main editing area, which includes a timeline with a play button, a progress bar showing '0:00 / 8:30', and a 'Layer 0' track. A 'Add a layer' button is located at the bottom left of the timeline.
